* Dobson Communications Corp. subsidiary Logix Communications Inc. has begun offering local telephone, long distance, cellular and paging services in the Oklahoma City market, officials said Tuesday.

* "This is only the beginning," Logix President Stephen Dobson said.

* "We have taken 60 years of Dobson experience, coupled it with excellent products and services, packaged it as Logix and are providing Oklahoma City with the best business telecommunications option in the market," he said.

Logix is competing against Southwestern Bell Telephone for both business and residential customers in the Oklahoma City area. But a spokesperson said, "Our primary focus is on businesses."

Residential customers interested in switching are told that to get local service from Logix, they also must take the company's long-distance service.

"We sell those as a package," a Logix sales representative said.

Before transferring a customer's local phone service from Bell, Logix requires a signed letter of authorization, the representative said.

Also before switching service, Logix requires the customer to either permit a credit check or submit a letter from Bell stating that the customer is in good standing and pays phone bills, she said.

"Logix was created to help businesses sort through all the confusing services and products available," Dobson said.

Logix offers free telecommunications consulting services called Logistix Plans, which analyze where and how businesses communicate and recommends how to meet telecommunications needs.

The company installed a telecommunications switch in downtown

Oklahoma City to permit it to offer local access and enhanced calling services.

- * Oklahoma City-based Dobson Communications is a holding company. It has eight subsidiaries offering telecommunications services in seven states.

Those services range from long distance and fiber-optic cable access to network management and local exchange services.
